

RITA G. GREER

WILLIAM L. HUSK

Rita G. Greer, a personnel specialist for the Jefferson County Public Schools in Louisville, Kentucky, is responsible for certified staffing of the district's 87 elementary and 13 special schools. Prior to entering personnel work, she was an administrative intern and coordinated the Minority Teacher Recruitment Project described in this fastback. A former teacher in grades 6 through 12, she has had extensive experiences in curriculum writing and program design and development. She has spoken throughout the nation on minority teacher recruitment issues. She received her doctorate from the University of Louisville in 1989.

William L. Husk has been on the faculty of the University of Louisville since 1964 and currently serves as director of Secondary Student Teaching. His work at the university has been closely associated with the local schools, involving supervision of intern teachers and student teachers and coordinating a fellowship program for school administrators. A former teacher and principal, Husk has helped to develop and direct several training and research projects funded by the Department of Education, National Institute of Education, National Science Foundation, MCREL, and the Danforth Foundation. Most recently, he has worked with the development and implementation of the Minority Teacher Recruitment Project described in this fastback.
